

IRA ALLEN HOOKER & THE OREGON TRAIL

1781 - 1857

Ira Allen Hooker and his wife, Sarah Taylor Hooker, arrived in southern Illinois from New York state before 1820. Sometime between 1821 and 1824 they relocated to Morgan County in west central Illinois. A more precise time estimate for their arrival is unavailable with current documentation.

Ira purchased 80 acres of land in Morgan County, Illinois on July 3rd 1827. This land was in the east half of the northeast quarter of Section 34 of Township 15 north and Range 12 west of the 3rd principal meridian. It can be precisely located yet today.

Ira and his family did not depart from Illinois for Oregon until 1848 and as no locatable records exist to the contrary it is reasonable to believe that Ira and his family occupied this land in Section 34 for more than 20 years. Although he must have crop-farmed in the conventional sense, information available today also suggests he also may have had fruit orchards and bred Morgan horses and Essex hogs as well. This (orchards/livestock) information was provided by Marguerite Overholser, although, she does not reveal her source of this information. Marguerite was born a Hooker and was the granddaughter of D.D. Hooker through his son, Jessie, her father.

On February 16th 1939 Scott County was established from a portion of Morgan County and included in that portion was the land which Ira had purchased in 1827. Thus, without relocating, Ira became a resident of newly established Scott County, Illinois. (For sake of envisionment by the reader, this land today is located approximately 50 miles nearly due west of Springfield, Illinois +/-).

At some point, with the notion that life would be somehow easier, better or more enjoyable or rewarding in the far west, pioneers and adventurers began to head west down the Oregon Trail. This began during the time when Ira and his family lived in Scott County, Illinois. By the fall of 1847 Ira had contracted "Oregon fever" and the decision had been made. He sold his land in Illinois (possibly to his son, Albinus?) and in the company of Sarah (nee Taylor), his wife, and three of his then adult sons and two daughters, in the spring of 1848, headed for Oregon. Among these sons was Permenus Petronius Hooker, the link in the Hooker line from Ira A. Hooker directly to the Irvine and Ashford families of today. (See closing genealogy).

As any number of Scott County locals were discussing such a move, more than one family determined to make this trip, all within a single company or party. Records reveal that a minimum of seven families started out for Oregon together from the Scott/Morgan County area in the spring of 1848.

These would have included the Byron J. Purvine family, the William Porter family and the Ira A. Hooker family. Notations in the available "William Porter Diary" also indicate a Holms family, a Joseph Blackerby family, a Steven Tucker family and a Stevens family traveling along as part of the group. At this time this group traveling together became known as the "Purvine Company". As the Ira A. Hooker family included Ira and three of his adult sons it would be a reasonable assumption that the Hookers left with a minimum of four wagons. The Purvine Company consisted of a total of 24 wagons as the company eventually left St. Joseph, Missouri. As a member, among the families traveling together as the Purvine Company, William Porter kept a diary of the trip which has survived to the present time and, when combined with similar diaries kept by others in companies headed down the trail just ahead of the Purvine Company in the spring of 1848 though, in close proximity to the Purvine Company, the story of the total 1848 overland migration to Oregon is revealed in considerable detail.

It should be noted that the trek to Oregon was maintained on a rather strict schedule. In the spring an attempt was made to limit travel until spring grasses had sprouted on the prairie. This spring bloom was necessary to feed the livestock along the way. In addition, it was known that the trip would require five months in total and every attempt was made to hurry along so as to beat the first winter snow in the western mountains, which could be crippling. It was only two travel seasons earlier that the Donner Party had been trapped in an early autumn snow and the stories of those horrors were still on lips and in the minds of travelers along the trail.

The Porter diary indicates that the Purvine Company was still in Illinois east of the Mississippi River on the 7th of April in 1848. By the 9th of April all in the company had crossed the Mississippi River into Missouri. The crossing was made at Louisiana, Missouri where there was a ferry capable of handling the livestock and wagons.

From the ferry at Louisiana, Missouri the party continued overland to St. Joseph, Missouri. As the journey progressed, a day of 10 miles was not considered to be a productive travel day. A day of 20 miles or more was considered to be a good travel day. The Purvine Company arrived at St. Joseph on the 23rd of April. Here, they laid up, rested and fed the livestock. They also procured any additional supplies they would require for the journey to Oregon. The Purvine Company finally began their crossing of the Missouri River on the 1st of May in 1848. As the early crossers in any company reached the other side of the Missouri they would go into camp and await the wagons following within their own company. Finally, all wagons and livestock in the Purvine Company had made the Missouri River crossing by days' end on the 4th of May. That night they all gathered together for a final pre-journey camp night at a place about 6 miles west of the ferry landing known as Peter's Creek (believed to be near Wathena, Kansas today). On the morning of May 5th, 1848 the journey to Oregon began for the Purvine Company which included the Ira A. Hooker family group.

The Hooker group of the Purvine Company has been documented as follows:

Ira A. Hooker (67) and his wife Sarah Taylor Hooker (62)
Permenus P. Hooker (32) and his newly married wife Charlotte Jane Kinkead Hooker (24)
Cyrenius C. Hooker (30)
Demetrius D. Hooker (22)
Eliza Marion Hooker (27)
Harriet T. Hooker (24)
Cyrus A. Hooker (Unknown Age and Relationship)

*Permenus Petronius Hooker
In his Later Years in Oregon*

Available information indicates that the Hookers traveled from Illinois with a herd of Morgan horses (possibly as many as forty) intended for breeding in Oregon and a drove of Essex piglets intended for the same purpose. These (piglets) were supposedly first carried in a crate in one of the wagons but eventually became too large to crate and were taught to walk along with the wagons. The wagons were pulled by oxen and although we can't know the number of oxen related to a wagon we are told that commonly a single wagon required as many as 5 teams of oxen for the journey including those teamed to pull and those that were rotated with the pulling teams at intervals. Additionally, cattle were taken live to be consumed along the trail as the journey progressed. These were consumed sparingly until the train had moved past buffalo country. One might imagine a river crossing with this company including the menagerie of animals included for the journey. Also, in addition to family members making the trip, hirelings accompanied the party whose jobs it would have been to drive the teams or herd the livestock, etc.

When the Purvine Company had been out of St. Joseph only a day or two they would have crossed paths with a group of men heading east on the trail. This group of seven individuals traveling on mules was led by a man named Joe Meek. The Meek group had left Oregon about sixty days previous and were on their way to Washington D.C. They were carrying a letter from the governor of the Oregon Territory and addressed to the President of the United States. In Oregon at the time, the settlers were being harassed by the local Cayuse

Indians to a considerable degree. Just south of the present location of Walla Walla, Washington, was a small community then known as the Whitman Mission. It was just off, and to the north of the Oregon Trail at that point where the trail came closest to what is the Oregon/Washington border today. The mission was a group of Methodists who ministered to the Indians in the area and, in addition, provided various necessary supplies and services to travelers on the trail. About six months previous, in the autumn of 1847, the Cayuse in the area had come down with an epidemic of measles. The disease had been hard on the tribe and had resulted in considerable loss of life among tribal members. The Indians, ignorant of diseases or their origins had come by the notion that the Methodists had conjured up this affliction for the intentional and sole purpose of decimating the tribe. Resultant was that the Indians had attacked the mission and wiped out the residents, man, woman and child, to the last individual. It had been a nasty affair now known as the Whitman Massacre. Now the Meek party was headed for Washington to lobby the President and Congress on behalf of the territorial governor for help for the Oregon settlers against the local Indians. As the Meek party came upon west bound travelers along the trail in the spring of 1848 they would stop and share a meal or a camp fire to the extent it was timely or convenient. Of course the further east the Meek party got the more embellished the shared story became. The problem for the west bound travelers became that many of the women had not wished to leave their comfortable homes for this journey to begin with. Now, the Meek stories fed their fears while, in their minds, proving the wisdom of their original reticence to make the trip in the first place. This caused considerable consternation among the married couples along the trail while wives argued the strong points of their original reluctance to leave comfortable homes in the east with these horror stories as the focal point of their reasoning.

It is said that the best travelers along the trail were farmers. They had experience working with wagons, teams, livestock, etc. Additionally, they were more accustomed to hardships and to overcoming adversity in their everyday lives. Those travelers from the city had no such experiences to draw from and did not fare as well along the trail. Only a day or two out of St. Joseph the diarists in the parties all noted the body of an Indian placed for interment in a tree along the trail. This was the customary means of disposing of any dead individual and became the subject of much conversation among the travelers just embarking on the trail.

One constant threat along the trail was stampeding of livestock. There seemed to be a constant irritation between the dogs and the pulling teams or other larger livestock. The dogs would bark and nip at the heels of the oxen or the cattle, etc. Eventually this would get them running. One excerpt from a diary tells of a stampede that ran 19 teams of oxen more than 8 miles from the trail. As this was going on the progress of the traveling company was in full abatement while those wagons immediately unaffected waited for the missing teams to be rounded up, returned and put back onto the trail in proper travel order. One possible final result was that a stampeding ox might break a leg during the rampage. This meant changing his name. He was no longer known by that name by which he had previously been called. Once he could no longer serve his intended function his new name was "dinner". I'm not sure what was finally done about the dog issue? No one is more of a dog lover than myself. However, this behavior by the dogs might actually prove life threatening to the travelers. Neither time nor resources could be replaced along the trail. These situations consumed both and the end result could eventually become most unfortunate for the travelers.

Following the travel of the companies from the diaries is an easier affair while the companies were yet eastward in their journey. Descriptions of locations along the way are today, easier to identify. Forts often became cities generally using the same names or familiar variations of the original names. Many noted land marks are familiar to us yet today. Later in the trip civilization was left far behind and names of places to relate to today became less certain. Later in the trip descriptions of places involved descriptions of river crossings, mountain passes, etc. Now, it might take considerable effort to pinpoint the location of a spot described in a diary during the western-most portion of the journey. For those interested, considerable generalized reading material is still available.

Indians, generally, would prove to be more of an irritation than a life threatening issue along the trail in the earlier migration years. In 1848 while the Hookers were on their way to Oregon the annual migration was sufficiently new that the travelers and the Indians were still getting along for the most part; or at least they were not openly hostile or did not commonly engage in lethal interaction. The Indians were indigenous peoples with whom one could trade, etc. There was likely an honest curiosity on the part of both peoples to be satisfied. The Indians did not of necessity feel a threat from the travelers in the early days as they were obviously moving through and not staying. Ten years later tension had grown considerably in consideration of the decimation of the buffalo herd and the relationship was not so simple. In the early days the act of "circling the wagons" had more to do with creating a temporary corral for livestock at night than in forming a protective barrier from the local inhabitants. One possible exception to the foregoing in 1848 was the Pawnee Indian tribe. The Pawnee people largely inhabited the central area of the Nebraska territory in 1848. The Pawnee were somewhat belligerent and possessed an arrogance with respect to the emigrants on the trail. They would approach the travelers in small groups and beg whatever might be had. This could be anything from livestock to food to blankets and clothing, to jewelry, etc. They intentionally presented a foreboding posture, had "sticky" fingers and had to be watched at all times. In the final analysis they were more of a pesky irritant than a serious threat but they had to be dealt with none the less. Every resource the travelers possessed was finite in nature. Only so much could be carried with them. Everything they possessed was either needed or otherwise precious in nature. Whatever they gave away or lost was difficult, if not impossible, to replace. This made resistance to the Indians' needs essential in many cases.

As travelers left St. Joseph in the spring of 1848 there were a total of 18 companies that struck out independently on the trail. As travel progressed one company might be slowed by some misfortune experienced within their group along the way. Another company might have smooth going thus making good headway. If a company pulled over or otherwise stopped to recover from some issue within its ranks, it might be passed by another company experiencing relatively unimpeded travel. In some cases, smaller companies might join ranks to present a larger appearance or defensive posture before the troublesome Pawnee or other tribes.

On June 3rd, 1848, the wagons along the trail were bottle necking into an area known as Ash Hollow. [41.3076 N, 102.1288 W Prox] Today this area is a western Nebraska State Park of the same name. The happenings of this day were such that in the evening six wagon companies had come together in camp, all at the same location. Immediately upon breaking camp from this location the route involved crossing the north branch of the Platte River. Here, the crossing would involve fording two branches of the river as there was an island in the river at the location of the north branch ford at Ash Hollow. This process would have been a slow one which could be how so many companies of wagons came to be backed up at one place and all at the same time. This assemblage COULD have constituted a third of all the wagons that went down the trail from St. Joseph to Oregon that year. The total wagons of these companies, all camped at a single geographic location at the same time, could have totaled as many as 100 to 150 wagons. This could have resulted in anywhere from 250 to 400 travelers all gathered in one location on the same day. It was on this day and at this location that Marguerite Overholser writes that the Hookers found the American Indian infant she identified as the one who would be named Sarah Catherine Hooker.

It should be noted that Marguerite, in her book, indicates that the source of the "Sarah story" information was a supposed incident handed down to her verbally by her father who, in turn, heard it (again, only verbally) from his father, D.D. Hooker, who would have been there to experience the happening in person. D.D. Hooker passed away prior to the birth of Marguerite so she never had an opportunity to hear it directly from her grandfather. It should be noted that nowhere can this incident be found elsewhere in writing in trail diaries, etc.; only in the book written by Marguerite Overholser. An abbreviated version of the story follows:

Along the way on the trail, the son of Ira Allen Hooker, Permenus Petronius Hooker, newly married, comes upon an abandoned camp site in or near Ash Hollow, western Nebraska, and there, finds an abandoned Indian child. The child was supposedly a little blue-eyed girl who would have been about six months of age at the time. The assumption of the story line is that due to her blue eyes the child was not considered a full blood Indian by tribal members and resultant was that the mother of the child was forced by her people to abandon the child (or did so of her own volition).

Permenus gathers the child and takes her to his newly married wife, Charlotte Jane (nee Kinkead, in camp nearby) and together they determine to keep the child and to raise her as their own. So goes the story and to this day family members familiar with the story have proudly acknowledged American Indian heritage as a result.

Here is what we now know for certain regarding Sarah Catherine Hooker:

The child who became known as Sarah Catherine Hooker, direct ancestor of the Irvine, Ashford, and other families, was born in the Oregon Territory in the spring of 1850 (most likely in late May). She was, of certainty, the natural born child of the parents who raised her. We know this from available proven historical documents as well as from results of modern day, state of the art, genetic (d.n.a.) testing of her descendants. At the time of Sarah's actual birth in the Oregon Territory, the American Indian infant of Overholser renown would have been 2-1/2 years of age (+/-).

Queries regarding this American Indian child:

Could an American Indian child have been found and recovered by a member of a wagon company camped at Ash Hollow on June 3rd 1848? (Yes)

Could that wagon company member have been Permenus Hooker and his wife, Charlotte Jane Kinkead Hooker? (Yes)

Was that wagon company member, of a certainty, Permenus Hooker and his wife? (No)

Assuming that the child was found by Permenus Hooker, did Permenus Hooker and his wife, to a certainty, take this child to be raised as their own child? (No)

Could the child have been found by Permenus Hooker and taken to be raised by some other member of a wagon company encamped at Ash Hollow that evening? (Yes)

Could Permenus Hooker and his wife have taken the child to raise as their own as they embarked westward from Ash Hollow on June 4th 1848? (Yes)

Was this child raised by Permenus Hooker and his wife to adulthood? (No)

Did this child, to a certainty, survive the trip from Ash Hollow to Oregon? (No)

Could this child have been passed on to another couple (in transit to Oregon) by Permenus Hooker and his wife, at Ash Hollow or elsewhere further along the trail? (Yes)

Was this child that same child who would live to adulthood in Oregon and come to be known to descendants as Sarah Catherine Hooker? (No)

There are endless possibilities to the story involving an American Indian child being recovered by the Hookers at the Ash Hollow camp site in Nebraska in 1848. One of the possibilities is not that our Sarah Catherine Hooker, direct ancestor of the Irvine, Ashford, and other families, was that child.

Windlass Hill at Ash Hollow, Nebraska. The Hookers passed this location on June 3rd, 1848. Note the wagon tracks still visible today.

In the last days before the Purvine Company struck out on the trail from St. Joseph two other companies had embarked just ahead of them. One was the Bolivar Walker Company. Walker had gone to Oregon down the trail in 1845. Since, he had returned to Pike County, Missouri to gather his family and to return to Oregon with them. This spring was his time to return to Oregon. The other group was the William Bristow Company. One or both of these companies had departed from Peter's Creek in east Kansas on May 3rd just two days ahead of the Purvine Company to which Ira Hooker and his family belonged. Along the way travel developed such that the Walker Company and the Bristow Company had joined ranks in travel and were now known as the Walker/Bristow Company. Between them they totaled 24 wagons. Somewhere along the way the Purvine Company caught up to the Walker/Bristow Company and it was agreed they would form up together under the command of Captain Bolivar Walker. This conjoined company of, now, 48 wagons was in place by June 3rd at Ash Hollow and finally completed the trip into Oregon City together. Available records indicate conflicting arrival dates of both September 29th and October 1st. Either date puts them at their destination prior to the feared winter weather of 1848/49. In all, the 18 companies leaving St. Joseph in the spring of 1848 formed into a total of 5 larger companies along the trail and eventually came into Oregon City in the fall months so arranged.

In addition to companies traveling to Oregon from St. Joseph, additional companies traveled to Oregon from Independence, Missouri.

There is no notation in William Porter's diary about passing Chimney Rock in western Nebraska. This was a milestone site in the travel to Oregon on the trail. The feature could be seen both days before and after passing the site.

Chimney Rock in western Nebraska. A milestone between Ash Hollow and Ft. Laramie

The Walker/Bristow/Purvine group arrived at Ft. Laramie on June 12th 1848 late in the day and departed on June 13th. So short a time at this location seems unusual as Ft. Laramie was a stop where resupply could be had. Additionally, the trail by now had taken a toll on oxen and it was not unusual to exchange oxen at this point for teams that were rested and recovered. Could all of this have been accomplished for 48 wagons in so short a time?

Ft. Laramie during the "Trail Days"

The next milestone on the journey was Independence Rock, southwest of present day Casper, Wyoming. The feature was so named as it was said that if you passed this point on the trail on or before Independence Day you were on track to arrive in Oregon in time to beat the feared winter weather in the mountains. The Walker/Bristow/Purvine company along with the Hooker party passed this rock on July 2nd, 1848 and camped eight miles beyond the rock that night.

Independence Rock in central Wyoming

Prior to 1845 wagon companies on the trail were forced to cease land travel at The Dalles, Oregon and take to the Columbia River to complete their journey to the Willamette Valley. Journal entries from the time indicate that this route was costly and dangerous and that many travelers met their demise from drowning in the Columbia River along the way. After this time one Samuel K. Barlow, also from Illinois, pushed a wagon load of freight through the Cascades and over the shoulder of Mt. Hood attempting to avoid the dangerous and expensive river journey. The route forged by Barlow had been opened as the Barlow Pass by the time of the 1848 spring journey. After months of open skies and prairie that had made the emigrants feel exposed the wagon trains now crawled into forests like nothing the emigrants had ever seen. One spot, Laurel Hill, was reportedly the single worst section on the entire home stretch. Travelers banged the wagons, heaved on wheel spokes, pulled fallen logs from the way, and begged the exhausted oxen for just one more mile.

Upon arrival in Oregon, travelers made application for and were awarded what was known as "Donation Land". The land was parceled out to single individuals at 320 acres per settler. Married individuals received 640 acres per household. Ira Hooker's land claim is available for inspection in material held by the Genealogical Forum of Portland, Oregon, Volume 1, Claim 1657. His original claim was in the Airlie area of Polk County. Affiants to his claim were Lambert McTimmonds and Samuel J. Gardner. His claim was awarded on October 15th 1850 and included 619.23 acres. The legal description was: Range 6W; Township 9S; It included portions of land in Sections 13, 14, 15, 22, 23, 24. Survey maps of the time, bearing the name "Ira A. Hooker" are still available for inspection today.

Finally, what became of the members of the Hooker family that traveled together from Illinois to Oregon in the spring and summer months of 1848?

Ira A. Hooker passed away on August 1st 1857 at the age of 76 years, 3 months and 30 days. He is buried in the Burch Pioneer Cemetery [Latitude: 44.92247, Longitude: -123.20953] on private farm land, presently owned by the Stoller family. (Contact Elmer Stoller, Independence, Oregon) The Burch Pioneer Cemetery is east of Rickreall, Oregon in Polk County.

Cyrenius Clark Hooker was awarded 320 acres of donation land near what is today, Rickreall in Polk County Oregon. On February 13th, 1852 he was working on a fence on his property when he was shot from ambush and killed by Return Everman. Everman was tracked down by a posse, tried, convicted and hung for his offence. When arrested he was in the possession of a gold watch known to be owned by Cyrenius. Prior to his execution he admitted his transgression both verbally and in writing. Cyrenius was buried in the Burch Pioneer Cemetery which was on land just to the east of his own property and which was owned by his neighbor, Samuel Burch. His donation land was bequeathed to his brother Permenus (a.k.a., P.P.). Later, Ira (d 1857), the father of Cyrenius, Parmenus (d 1857), the son of Permenus, Eliza (d 1922), daughter of Ira and Sarah, Harriet (d 1860), daughter of Ira and Sarah, were also buried in the Burch Pioneer Cemetery plot along with the husband of Eliza. Sarah Taylor Hooker (d 1869) is also listed among the deceased buried in the Burch Pioneer Cemetery. She, however, is buried in the Montgomery Cemetery to the southwest of Rickreall, and near Pedee. Her stone is in the Hooker plot with only the name "Sarah" on it.

Charlotte Jane Kinkead Hooker, wife of Permenus (a.k.a., Nemus) passed away in 1866. She is buried in the Montgomery Cemetery.

Permenus Petronius Hooker (a.k.a., P.P.) passed away on August 26th, 1900 in Rickreall, Polk County, Oregon. He is buried at Montgomery Cemetery and his grave is marked with a flush stone stating only "Parmenus". Note, on various documents encompassing his life his name is spelled, variously and alternately, Parmenus and Permenus.

Demetrius Hooker (a.k.a. D.D.) lived on or around his donation land claim in Polk County (near present day Lewis) until after 1880. In the 1894 state or territorial census he is shown living in Lane County, Oregon to the south of Polk County. Demetrius finally passed away in Eugene in Lane County in July of 1908, the last survivor of the overland trip from Illinois to Oregon. He is buried in the Crow Cemetery in Lane County, Oregon.

Today, the Montgomery Cemetery is on a parcel located in Polk County on the south side of Maple Grove Road in the far southeast corner of the donation land which was deeded to Ira A. Hooker in the fall of 1850. The cemetery is at the end of an unmarked double track dirt road and cannot be seen from Maple Grove Road. Numerous Hooker family members and their descendants are buried in this plot today.

The total history of the Oregon Trail shows as many as 350,000 individuals traveling to Oregon from Missouri over the nearly twenty-year history of the trail. This number did not include those individuals traveling to California or the Mormon migration to Salt Lake City. In 1848 approximately 1350 individuals traveled to Oregon from St. Joseph, Missouri. This total included the Hooker family.

Of these totals, perhaps as many as 20,000 individuals died in route along the trail. Of the total death toll, perhaps as few as 400 died in actual engagements with the native American Indians. The greatest death toll came from diseases including cholera, scurvy, small pox and tick-borne fever. Accidental gunshot wounds, burns and broken bones also took their toll. Additionally, numerous individuals were run over by wagon wheels as they walked along beside the heavy rolling wagons. A little quick math will tell you that the death toll amounted to as many as 10 dead individuals for every mile of trail traveled over the useful period of the trail.
